Personal Appearance

Burkinabè wear both African and Western clothing. In rural settings, men wear a robe (boubou), while women wear a wraparound skirt (pagne) with a blouse or T-shirt. In cities, women wear elaborate, colorful African outfits made of locally designed or imported fabrics. Men used to often wear the tenue de fonctionnaire (civil servant suit, with shirt and pants made of the same cloth), but now slacks or jeans with shirts made of colorful pagne fabric are more common. Imported suits are cheaper than locally made suits.

Both rural and urban dwellers buy used clothing imported from Europe, Asia, and the United States. However, former president Thomas Sankara called for consumption of local products, an idea civic leaders continue to advocate. As a result, embroidered traditional outfits have become more popular attire for social events.

Women often have elaborate hairstyles and change them every few weeks; wealthier women may change them as frequently as twice a week. Braided extensions, wigs, and “spikes” of hair (made by wrapping hair with black thread) are common. Although on the decline, traditional face

Gestures

Burkinabè use the right hand to greet people, pass items, and eat. Using the left hand, especially for greeting or eating, is extremely offensive. Some believe that a left-handed child is possessed by evil spirits, and parents often train their children to use the right hand. Men and women hold hands in public with friends of the same gender, but public displays of affection between men and women are usually inappropriate. In some areas, small gestures such as gifts, invitations, holding hands, short kisses, or bringing meat or chickens home can show love.

To motion to someone using the index finger is considered disrespectful; instead, one motions with the palm of the hand down. Many Burkinabè avoid calling out someone’s name unless the person is nearby because of a belief that the devil may overhear the name, call it out, and thereby cause the person to die. As a result, people only respond to their name when they can see the person calling out. If the person is farther away, it is polite to whistle or make a loud “psst” noise in order to get his or her attention. Burkinabè express disgust at events or actions by rounding the lips and making a

in Pediatric Physical Assessment. Nursing Education in Video: Third Edition. Medcom, Inc.

00:00:40 Performing a physical assessment on a pediatric patient requires that health care professionals have a solid knowledge base of the normal growth and development patterns of children. This series will focus on the technical skills used to perform a head to toe well-child evaluation, as well as how to approach and minimize the stress during the process. Part one of this series began with a brief discussion of developmental issues to be considered when performing a physical examination of a child. Next, setting the stage for the evaluation and getting the history were described. The techniques used by staff to perform the assessment were then defined. Finally, the initial phases of the evaluation process, including looking at the child's

Abstract

Translate

If you have a plaque of atherosclerosis that is partially blocking blood flow in a coronary artery, your doctor may try to open the blockage One of the ways to open a blocked artery is with an angioplasty and stent Here is the problem that needs to be fixed We are looking inside a coronary artery that has atherosclerosis You can see the plaque, the buildup of cholesterol, on the inside wall of the artery This plaque is big enough that not much blood is getting through From the symptoms, the doctor suspects there is a blockage in 1 or more of the coronary arteries First, the doctor needs to find the blockage, then to fix it Even though the blockage is located in an artery deep within the body, there is a pretty easy way for the doctor to find it All of the arteries in the body come from the heart, including the blocked coronary artery and an artery in your groin Any artery that comes from your heart is like a highway leading back to your heart The artery in your groin lies right under the skin During the cardiac
